According to Lynch, the emergence of satellite television channels like al-Jazeera and of the Internet are creating a new Arab public sphere outside of the previous monopoly over Voices of the New Arab Public: Iraq flow of information sought by Arab states. Marc Lynch provides a comprehensive overview of the historical rise of new Arab media and public spheres, in which Arabs attempt to break stereotypes and represent themselves, giving voice to views and ideas that are usually absent in both their state-controlled media and Western media. It is critical and suspicious of American policy. Lynch v Abu Aardvark Technorati: But it is also a cautionary tale of a huge energy that we have hardly begun to appreciate. Its successfully counter the continuous process of demonization of Arab media. The book argues that building a culture of pluralism and public debate is a necessary condition for achieving real democratic reforms.
