He responded to subsequent Jesuit allegations of injustice and discrimination both by defending the actions of the Harvard Law School and by denigrating Jesuit education – a matter made worse by his published attack on Jesuit education in the Atlantic Monthly in A Theory of Historical Studies. Werner investigates the interrelation of the geographical and the intellectual topography of Jena, and demonstrates in a very interesting way this interaction through the central figure of the book, the publisher Eugeen Diederichs, whose project of cultural renewal was a construct within the particular context of Jena and simultaneously the footing for a newly imagined environment.

For the full detailed programme please see page The particular attention to Schrijner, former President: Studies of nineteenth-century French schools reveal striking similarities with what is depicted in this book but there are interesting differences, notably the absence of any foreign languages, especially French, or the comparatively lesser focus on deportment and good manners so central to the French pedagogical project.
