Role playing with standardized patients and scoring the interaction on both adherence to process and content is one strategy to impart skills. This could have the effect of reducing the effect size between the treatment and control groups, leading the researcher to incorrectly conclude that the experimental treatment is not effective when it was actually not given a fair test. Participant performance of the intervention skills will be assessed in settings in which the intervention might be applied.

Allows for specific feedback to providers during supervision. The effect of this misdiagnosis on treatment can be particularly negative; counselors often view clients with a borderline personality diagnosis as difficult to treat and unresponsive to treatment. For example, tell the client that the screening and assessment phase focuses on identifying issues that might benefit from treatment.
