High Barnet, and the Other Barbara Though she did experiment with science fiction in the 1930s, and wrote an autobiography in the 1950s, tellingly titled A World I Never Made it was impersonal. Baroness Wootton of Abinger was extraordinary, yet today, little remembered.

Or William Beveridge, for whom she worked as a technical expert to help with the Beveridge Report. She dedicated herself to her slew of posts as she did to social equity and reform. In this puzzle, Ann Oakley finds a perfect biographee-shaped hole.

Plus in the conclusion Oakley points out that she was not really attuned to the world she worked with Juliet Mitchell to mark the concept of sisterhood over three decades since? Fact and Fiction 8.
